

TEIDE NATIONAL PARK

Lunar testing ground

Archive photo of a previous test in 2012

During the first two weeks of October the Teide National Park, and in particular the area known as Minas de San José, was used for the trial runs of a robot designed to function in space.

This time it was the turn of the multinational technology firm GMV who were trying out a robot designed for the LUCID project, (Lunar scenario concept validation and demonstration), which is being led by GMV and financed by the European Space Agency. The finished version of the robot currently being tested will eventually be working on the poles of the Moon. Minas de San José was chosen as the terrain is very similar to that which the rovers will experience on the Earth's satellite. Specifically, the craft is being tested for programming an arrival and exit point and to localise particular elements such as water or methane.
