Box spring beds - a growing trend

Box spring beds have a long tradition in the USA and Scandinavia, but it's only recently that the trend reached other parts of Europe.

The special thing about this type of bed is the construction, consisting of a base box, mattress and topper. The headboard and legs are available in different shapes and colours. Only if all three of the bed elements are of high quality and well coordinated with each other, does the box spring bed offer the best quality for resting and sleeping. The advantages are, for example, the high lying position and the great relaxing sensation which this bed gives, in contrast to conventional beds. This makes getting in and out of the bed particularly easy. In addition, the box spring bed is extremely back-friendly, and those who have problems in the lumbar spine or the inter-vertebral disc area will especially appreciate this quality. The back is optimally supported during sleep. It is also important for couples to choose mattresses of varying hardness according to their individual needs, which are held together by a common cover as if they were a large you may have to pay for it with your health. Even with so many of the advantages of the box spring bed, it is not the best solution for everyone. Depending on your needs, normal bed systems made with adjustable slatted frames can be the better choice. That's why it's important not to buy the bed according to trend and appear-mattress. It's also particularly hygienic. Everybody loses about half a litre of liquid per night by night-sweating, and because the air circulation in box spring beds is particularly good, the moisture is released into the air and not transferred to the mattress. Due to the good pressure equalisation, the mattress is particularly durable and the substructure is also stable. Last but not least, the modern design of the box spring bed is convincing.

However, good quality does not come at a bargain price and if you are thinking of buying an especially cheap one,
