Will La Palma site the TMT telescope after all?

The mayor of Puntagorda in La Palma, Vicente Rodríguez, has set everything in motion to prepare for the eventuality that the newest super telescope will be built in La Palma after all.

The Thirty Meter Telescope, known simply as TMT, will be the most advanced and powerful ground-based telescope in history and the largest optical/near-infrared telescope in the Northern hemisphere, by far.

GRAN CANARIA

Elite British University comes to the Islands

The London School of Economics and Political Science (LSE), has opened a research 'laboratory' in Las Palmas de Gran Canaria.

Its aim is to work with the various Canary Islands and international contacts to develop intelligent digital solutions and promote the Islands' potential. Renowned worldwide, this university has already produced 19 Nobel Award winners and 52 Heads of State.

The establishment of the research laboratory is supported by both the Island Council and the Canary Islands Government. "This initiative will allow the Canary Islands to take an important step towards the internationalisation of our economy by building a multifaceted economic model, generating new sources of income and skilled jobs" said Canary Islands President Fernando Clavijo during his visit at the end of March.
