Guardia Civil officers who were on a routine patrol in the Mount Teide National Park recently came across a small group of hikers in the Llano de Ucanca area who needed their help.

A 56-year-old woman had fallen so awkwardly that she had broken her left ankle and was suffering severe pain. Thankfully, she had several members of her family with her. The woman was placed on a stretcher and carried by the officers back to the road, where an ambulance was waiting for her. ■

On April 11, Guardia Civil officers in Puerto Rico, Gran Canaria, arrested a Swedish man on suspicion of killing his wife.

The 45-year-old had called the emergency services at 10am. Unfortunately, the 42-year-old woman was found without life, and the statements the male made about the situation aroused suspicion on the part of the officers. Shortly afterwards, forensic experts confirmed that the nature of her injuries was an indication of a possible physical attack, so the man was taken into custody.

As we went to press, the background to the case had not yet been made public, but should the suspicion be confirmed, this would be another case of 'gender violence', which is generally defined in Spain as any act of violence committed by a man against a woman with whom he is currently affiliated or used to be, though there are also cases of women using violence against men. ■

Guardia Civil officers have arrested a 43-year-old Spaniard in La Laguna who has supposedly made over 100 calls in which he expressed hatred, discrimination and violence against Muslims and immigrants.

The man had several profiles on the known social networks and had registered the maximum number of friends allowed for each one. He has now appeared before Court Number Four in La Laguna to be charged with a hate crime. The investigation was initiated by the Public Prosecutor's Office which deals with this type of offence, because the author's acts were of particular severity and showed a propensity towards violence. ■
